Variety of opportunities open door for research
In just four years, Avery U. graduated with her bachelor’s and master’s degrees from the School of Life Sciences. While she knew early on that she wanted to study biology, finding a focus for her research took a little longer and it wasn’t until she began work in an ASU research lab as a graduate student that she found her niche. Post graduation, Avery plans to continue her research in the same lab, spending time studying sex-biased gene expression in brain tissue samples from Alzheimer’s patients.
